

Elizabeth Warren Praises President Obama's Action for Young Immigrants Scott Brown Slams Door on Young People Again

U.S. Senate candidate Elizabeth Warren applauds President Obama's executive order to allow as many as 800,000 young, undocumented immigrants to avoid the threat of deportation for two years.

"Many of these young people have gone to school here or served in our military, and they should be able to continue living and working here," said Warren. "Two years ago, Scott Brown denied the dreams of these young people. His vote to kill the DREAM Act cost our communities and our country, until the President took action today."

Elizabeth Warren stands with the President in giving young immigrants a chance, while Republican Senator Scott Brown has blasted the decision, saying that he "opposed this policy in legislative form, and [he] oppose[s] it today as an executive order."

In reiterating his long-time opposition to reform, Brown is once again slamming the door on young immigrants – many of whom have worked hard to get an education, to serve in our military, and to contribute to their families and communities. In 2010, Brown voted in support of a Republican filibuster that blocked the DREAM Act even though it had the support of the majority of the Senate, including several Republicans.

Elizabeth Warren believes that America is unique precisely because it embraces so many differences, and that our diversity makes us a stronger, more innovative, and more creative country. Implementing common sense, comprehensive immigration reform, including a legal path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, will help retain talent trained at America's world-class institutions and support job creation.

Scott Brown and the Republican Party's attacks on young immigrants need to stop, and that starts with ensuring there is a fair and legal path to citizenship.

For more information and to get involved, visit: www.elizabethwarren.com.